The Book of Chunks

Introduction

Chunks are groups of words that frequently occur together in authentic language; they are semantically complete and have a clear pragmatic or discourse function. For example,

- middle of the night
- at the kitchen table
- out of the way
- flying through the air
- on the other side
- she could find a way

Chunks are different from n-grams and bundles. While these are also strings of words that occur frequently in authentic language, they begin and end according to the number of words that n represents. In these examples, the last two are semantically whole, while the others are not:

- know what to do
- and there was a
- something to do with
- might be able to
- what are you doing
- at the same time

The chunks listed in this book were derived from the Corpus of Native-Speaking Youth English (CONYE) that was created in 2022 under the auspices of a British Council China research grant. The research was funded through the China Research Innovation Award (RIA), an annual research award for targeted China-UK partnerships of national significance in distinct research areas.

During the life of the project, the output of the corpus research evolved to show the chunks in which the nouns, verbs and adjectives on the New National English Curriculum (NNEC) lists are used. All of the chunks in the output resources, namely an online database (see below) and this Book of Chunks, contain only words that are on the lists and which occur at least twice in the corpus that was created for this purpose.

The corpus contains c.50 million words of written and spoken language that young, mainly British, people read and write, hear and say. It is therefore a corpus representing both receptive and productive skills. The target vocabulary appears in the NNEC for primary and junior secondary school children in China. The target age range is 9 to 15 although the corpus covers a slightly wider age range. The corpus was created in the corpus management tool, Sketch Engine, which facilitates a wide range of linguistic processing. The full word list is provided below in the form of lemmas, i.e., the base forms of words, and without parts of speech. Many of these words are used in more than one part of speech, i.e., conversion, and many of the words are polysemous.

Corpus tools are not currently equipped to identify strings of words that are semantically whole. Nevertheless, using syntagms as an intermediary stage, it has been possible to derive many thousands of semantically whole chunks. Syntagms are strings of parts of speech and can be derived from a part-of-speech (POS) tagged corpus using a similar search to that for bundles. In searching for bundles, strings of words are sought. In searching for syntagms, strings of POS tags are sought. In Sketch Engine, searches are formed thus:

Bundles: [word = ".*"] [word = ".*"] [word = ".*"] [word = ".*"]

Syntagms: [tag = ".*"] [tag = ".*"] [tag = ".*"] [tag = ".*"]

From CONYE, almost 2.5 million syntagms were downloaded into the database and in true Zipfian fashion, over two million of them occur fewer than seven times in the corpus. Zipf's Law as applied to the frequency of words in a corpus of natural language states that the most common word occurs approximately twice as often as the next most common one, three times as often as the third most common, and so on.

The most frequent four-item syntagm in the CONYE corpus is PP VVP RB VV i.e., personal pronoun + present tense verb (not 3rd person) + adverb + lexical verb. The adverb is usually n't or not, so the most frequent chunks here are I don't know | mind. Slightly less frequently occurring chunks derived from this syntagm are: we don't mind, they don't listen, they don't remember, you needn't go, I don't bite. There are some without the negative particle, such as I feel absolutely fine, I do solemnly swear, I get very cross. However, these are a select few of the almost 2,000 chunks derived from this syntagm that occur more than once in CONYE. The vast majority are not semantically whole.

While verbs used intransitively can bestow completeness on these phrases, more often than not, semantically incomplete bundles emerge. There is no tag marking transitivity. After I don't know, the next most frequent ones are I don't think | like | want, which are not semantically whole.

A far more reliable final in a syntagm from which to derive semantically complete chunks is the noun, as this has the potential to yield noun phrases. The most frequently occurring four-item syntagm ending with a noun is NN IN DT NN, i.e. singular noun + preposition + determiner + singular noun. It is the basis for over 100,000 different items in the subcorpus of the target age range.

Fourteen syntagms ending in nouns were used to find chunks in CONYE. The most frequent 5,000 chunks of each of these syntagms were imported into the database. The syntagm mentioned above yielded over 3,000 chunks, many of which contain words that are not on the NNEC lists, e.g. edge of the forest, dolly in a pram, lord of the castle. The database matches each word in each chunk to the NNEC list, and only if all of the words match, is the chunk included in this Book of Chunks. This approach was adopted with all chunks.

Using syntagms to identify chunks containing verbs and adjectives required a different approach. Semantically intact syntagms that contained words in these parts of speech were selected individually.

Using the chunks

One of the research questions that motivated this project asked how native speaker children use the words that are on the NNEC. Chunks that were found to recur in the language produced by and/or for the target age group are listed alphabetically by the target word in the chunk. Due to the data available as well as the criteria for automatically generating the lists and for excluding non-compliant chunks, it is inevitable that none of the sets of chunks give a complete overview of the ways in which a word is used. Nevertheless, the chunks offer resource writers and English teachers unique insights into the ways that young native speakers experience the NNEC words. The words' lexical and grammatical cotexts are complemented in the collocations and grammar patterns that can be searched in the CONYE online database.

Article

A full description of the project, including the creation of this Book of Chunks, is available in How British native speaker children use the words on the Chinese vocabulary lists (Thomas, J. Forthcoming).

Online database

All of the chunks in this book, as well as collocations, grammar patterns and illustrative sentences are available in a searchable online database that was created as part of this project. The exponents of these syntagmatic relationships revolve exclusively around the words in the Chinese New National English Curriculum.

The online database can be accessed here: <https://bit.ly/conye23>.

Details are available in the User Guide on the site.

The syntagms

The POS tags that were used to create the syntagms do not only indicate the word classes but their subtypes. For example, modal verbs (MD), past tense (VVD), past particles (VVN), third person singular (VVZ) forms. Singular (NN), plural (NNS) and proper (NP) nouns have their own tags. A complete list of these tags follows this list of syntagms. The asterisks are wildcards. The code is the number that appears in square brackets in this book.

Acknowledgements

A project of this magnitude is inevitably the manifestation of a team of talented and committed people. It has been a delight to work with two of the directors of TransformELT, Alan Pulverness and Sarah Mount. Both Alan and Sarah have considerable experience of working with Chinese teachers at different levels, and Alan acted as editor on Discovering English with Sketch Engine (Thomas, J., 2016).

They were the joint recipients of a Research Innovation Award from British Council China under the 2021-2022 English Research and Materials Development Award scheme. Their Chinese partners were Professor and Senior Research Fellow Yafu Gong at the Basic Education Curriculum and Teaching Material Research Center, National Institute of Education Sciences (BECTMRC), and Associate Professor Yuanke Li at South China Normal University. Project Manager for British Council, China was Fraser Bewick, Senior Academic consultant (East Asia).

The corpus was created with the help of three Czech colleagues. My good friend and long-term collaborator, famous for his development of SkELL and VersaText, Vit Baisa, conducted sophisticated Sketch Engine searches, programmed an API and processed data from the CHILDES databases and subcorpora of The Spoken BNC2014. Jiří Vrbas and Vilém Heger scoured the internet for texts and transcripts that become the core of the corpus.

The database was created in Filemaker and the online database is hosted by the Swiss company, walkingtoweb.com. The director, Thomas Hahn, has been very supportive.
